Fuel Selections Strategy for Energy Production Requirements

The demand for electrical and thermal energy for most energy consumers has been growing. Along with the growth and demand has been an escalation in the cost of energy production. In the past, the low cost of natural gas compared to the high cost of electricity clearly focused on the cogeneration of energy toward natural gas fueled systems. The rapid rise in the cost of natural gas has resulted in many cogeneration plants curtailing operation.

The strategic selection of fuel for cogeneration allows the end user the option to play the energy market to best achieve low cost production of thermal and electrical energy.
